ABSTRACT

This study is focused on natural sacred places, in particular tree shrines and a sacred park, found within the vicinity of Duxton Plain Park and Tanjong Pagar, an area of historical and cultural significance in Singapore. Besides gaining an understanding of the meaning and values invested upon these sacred places, it is also an architectural investigation that deals with the reading of these places as morphological elements set within the urban environment.