Death arouses great curiosity as well as fear. Death is integrated as a concept into religious belief systems, by maintaining an awareness of death through performance of rituals in the community and affirming it part of life. Religions generally provide answers about death to offer direction and support in the face of it.

Man has used cremation to dispose of the dead since prehistoric times. Cremation is a manifestation of enlightenment and modernity. The preference for cremation could be adherence to religions or personal preference for its cost and efficiency as a mean of disposal. Cremation evokes questions that will have implications on society, especially in the local context of rich cultural background and finally, a search for the necessity in the ways to remember the dead.
