Abstract

The HDB public housing programme has achieve a successful level at a time which one might says, coincides with the nation’s transition into a developed country. The time of rapid mass housing catering to slums and answering to poverty and housing shortage is over. It is time yet for another paradigm, not at all a completely new model, but one that is a continuation from our present state, towards the notion of a higher standard of living.

The existing floor plans and single-plane volumetric spaces of the individual flat units in high-rise seem destine to stay. Yet the constant search for better dwelling still persist with respect to the notion of a higher standard of living in our increasingly successful nation.
