ABSTRACT

The focus of this dissertation is the evaluation of historic districts of Singapore, using Chinatown Historic District as an example. This paper attempts to investigate firstly the significance and history of these districts, the present role they are playing in relation to the contemporary society of today. Lastly, how current economical, social and architectural influences from the contemporary society of Singapore can affect this role giving rise to the question of whether this role needs to be re-identified.